IMF says impact of COVID-19 on Zambia's economy will be heavy

The international Monetary Fund (IMF) staff team has held virtual meetings to discuss the Government of Zambia's request for emergency support under the Rapid Credit Facility.

The discussions covered the authorities' response to the COVID-19 pandemic, recent economic developments, the economic outlook and policies and the medium term.

The social and macroeconomic impact of the COVID-19 shock, on top of a severe drought last year, will be heavy. Growth is forecast at around 5% in 2020, substantially lower than envisaged at the beginning of the year, the number of people living in extreme poverty is expected to increase. Fiscal pressures in 2020 have increased due to significantly lower revenue collections and higher spending needs. Zambia has requested support under the G20 Debt Service Standstill Initiative, which would provide temporary fiscal space this year.

In a statement issued at the end of the IMF virtual consultative meeting with Zambia.

“Discussions covered both near and medium-term policies to address these challenges and the underlying macroeconomic vulnerabilities, including the main elements of the revised 2020 Budget with a focus on spending for the COVID-19 health, social and economic response. Discussions will continue as the authorities determine their policies and priorities in the formulation of the revised 2020 Budget, as well as the medium-term fiscal stance needed to restore debt sustainability, revive growth and lower poverty.”
